ELLA HARVEY'S BAD RECORD.

THE WOMAN WHO SHOT COL. DEMING HER OWN WORST ACCUSER.

How She and Her Victim are Alleged to Have Ensured a Young Man into Marriage—He Frees Himself by a Great Effort—Posing as the Woman's Guardian—The Colonel Away and the Woman Free.

Ella Harvey, who shot Col. Lafayette L. Deming, of the Gorham Manufacturing Company, at No. 9 West Twenty-first street, Wednesday afternoon, was discharged yesterday at Jefferson Market, because the wounded man refused to prosecute her. Judge Duffy issued a summons for him when he did not appear in court. The officer who served it found him coming out of the house to take a train to visit his wife in Stamford and explain things. Deming refused to make a complaint and the Harvey woman told Judge Duffy she shot him because he had wronged her. Then she went to No. 313 East Nineteenth street, where she boards. A World reporter saw her there and she told a story of shame in a very brazen way. Her story is corroborated by the evidence in her husband's successful suit for divorce. She says she married when fourteen years old an Italian, who died a year afterwards. Four years ago she came to New York. Aug. 21, 1884, she first saw Col. Deming in Union square. He accosted her, they dined together, and thereafter they did not separate for some time. A few days later, on Deming's return from Saratoga, where he went to bring home his wife, he found another place for the woman, and she remained there until November. For two weeks during that period, while Mrs. Deming was absent in Philadelphia, she and Deming lived as man and wife. In November Deming engaged board for her with Mrs. Nicholson, at No. 404 Lexington avenue, representing himself as her guardian. The day after the latter went there she met Victor Eugene Tagliaferro, a young man, a native of Malta, who had been in the country only a short time. On New Year's Day, 1885, she promised to marry him. The engagement was broken three times, but the marriage finally took place Feb. 6. The Rev. Dr. Grimsford performed the ceremony at his residence, No. 17 West Thirty-second street. Mrs. Harvey says that Tagliaferro went to Col. Deming before that event, and, under the impression that the latter was her guardian, asked permission to marry her. This, she says, was refused, on the ground that the suit did not have money enough; so the marriage was apparently a clandestine one. "It took me two weeks," she proudly remarked, "to get my husband's name," and indulging in similar jokes. The couple parted Feb. 23, seventeen days after marriage, according to her story. She assigns as a reason the financial straits of her husband, who she says told her he had a note for $500 then due, and asked her "to work the old man"—meaning the colonel—so that they could get the money. They quarrelled because she refused, and so they parted. Suit for divorce was commenced, but she said she did not know how the case was decided, and she did not care. Three weeks ago she went to No. 9 West Twenty-first street to engage a room. She picked out one connecting with a hall room, which she said she would take. Deming engaged the latter, and has since occupied it. She went there Wednesday and waited for him to come.

systematic series of forgeries on a bank known, arrived in this city on the steamship, consin, of the Guion line, yesterday. When the steamer reached Quarantine it was boarded by Detective Sergeants Maguire and Doyle, of Inspector Byrnes's force, who placed Bidwell under arrest. He was taken to Police Headquarters and locked up in the Inspector's room, where he was closely questioned. Then he was taken to Jefferson Market and arraigned before Judge Duffy on the charge of being a suspicious character. As Bidwell is a native-born American there was nothing to prevent his landing on the ground of his being a criminal, and as he is a hopeless cripple, whose family promise to take care of him, he was discharged. He left the city on a late train last night for Massachusetts, where his wife and son have resided since he left this city, sixteen years ago, to engage in the system of forgeries by which he and his associates succeeded in securing several million dollars from the Bank of England.

Bidwell was pardoned July 23. He was then confined in Woking Prison and in charge of two attendants started immediately for Liverpool, where he boarded the Wisconsin, on which his sister had engaged passage for him and for herself. The prison guards remained with him until the steamer sailed. He is paralyzed from his hips down and unable to walk a step, it being necessary to carry him about. The Wisconsin encountered extremely rough weather, and a second-cabin passenger named Wright had both bones of the forearm fractured, being struck by a wave which washed over the deck. Bidwell was a pretty good sailor, and despite the buffeting that the steamer got he was carried to his meals, and he spent a great part of each day on deck. He went under the name of A. D. Howe, and outside of the officers his identity was not known. But he attracted not a little attention by reason of his eccentricities and his habit of declaiming poetry of his own composition. It is claimed that he is insane, and this as much as his crippled condition led to his pardon.

Inspector Byrnes received word that Bidwell had sailed, and he detailed Detectives Maguire and Doyle to arrest him on his arrival. At 8.40 yesterday morning—five minutes after the steamer was reported as passing Sandy Hook—they started for the United States revenue cutter, William E. Chandler, along with the customs inspectors. They boarded the Wisconsin there and hunted for their man. Detective Doyle, who knew Bidwell when he lived in this city in 1871, had no difficulty in picking him out, although finding he was much changed in appearance. He is a slight man of average height, of dark complexion, and his black hair and heavy mutton-chop whiskers and mustache are pretty well silvered. He wears a dark suit of dark blue. While on the main deck, whether he had been carried early in the morning, the detectives confronted him and told him he was their prisoner. He was not only astonished, but also highly indignant.

"There is something back of all this," he angrily said. "You are not detectives, but blackmailers. I am not wanted for any crime, and the law has nothing whatever to do with me." His sister also expostulated at the interference. She is a matronly and genteel-looking woman on the shady side of fifty, and was dressed in deep mourning. When Bidwell realized that he was exciting commotion he went down to his stateroom. The Wisconsin was expected to arrive Tuesday night and his wife and son had made preparations to meet him. They left a note to be delivered to him in the stateroom, and before they reached the dock asking him to leave word where they could find him. He had prepared a note for them stating that he would go to the United States Hotel, register under his own name and await them there. When the steamer reached her wharf Mrs. Bidwell and her son, a bright looking, quiet young man, twenty-one, had greeted Bidwell in his stateroom. His wife is an attractive woman, with gray hair and was dressed in a stylish brown costume with a yellow feather. Bidwell was brought over the steamer's side by the attendants who had carried him up aboard. A cage was in waiting, and in this Bidwell was placed, accompanied by Mrs. Bidwell, her son and sister-in-law. One of the detectives mounted the box and then the carriage drove off, followed by a couple of detectives in a cab which kept close behind. From the Mott street side the party entered Police Headquarters and went into Inspector Byrnes's room. Bidwell was left alone with the officers.

It was hard work for the Inspector to get a statement from Bidwell because he talked in a rambling way. He said that he was born in Medina, this State, in 1823, and was a wholesale grocer there before he came to this city and got "into bad company," as he expressed it. He lived in this city about six months and in 1871 went to England. The combination to rob the Bank of England, he asserts, was not formed until he reached the other side. When asked to what extent the forgeries were successful Bidwell answered:

"Some say $1,000,000, some $2,000,000 and others think as much as $3,000,000. A great deal was made good afterwards. They took several thousand pounds from me when I was arrested and that was all I had. Some people think I kept a large part of the money, but I haven't any at all. Here is every bit I have," and he turned his pocket inside out and dumped the contents on the table. There were several gold coins in the lot, but this was the sum total of his possessions, he claimed. After making his statement the prisoner became very restless. He recited one of his poems, called "Lightning at Sea," with considerable dramatic force. Just before 4 o'clock he was taken to a cell standing at the Mott street entrance, supported on the shoulders of Detectives Doyle and Rogers. As the trio descended the stone steps a photographer stationed on the opposite side of the street took an instantaneous picture of him. There was no portrait of Bidwell in the Regue's Gallery and one was desired. That was one of the reasons why he was arrested, and besides it was considered a wise precaution to have some of the Central Office detectives see him, as he is to be kept under surveillance.

The party was driven to Jefferson Market and went in by the private entrance on Tenth street to Justice Duffy's private room. The Justice suspended his other business long enough to attend to Bidwell's case. In the presence of a World reporter he made a statement to the Justice. He said his family was possessed of some property and would take care of him. There was no likelihood of his ever again transgressing, for he had had a bitter experience. Now that he had regained his liberty, he had placed himself under the care of his wife. He had caused his family a great deal of suffering through his misdeeds, and for the rest of his life he wanted to do what he could to atone for the past. For fourteen years he said he had been an inmate of British prisons, six of which were at Dartmoor. He first went to Pontonville prison and while there became sick. The sudden change from a life of affluence to a cell was too much for him and he was seized with lambo. This grew worse and developed into a serious physical condition. The authorities thought he was shamming and put him in a dark cell and kept him there for five years.

"During those five years I never saw the sun or the earth," he said, and the tears filled his eyes as he choked back a sob. He added: "It took them eight years to find out that I was not shamming."

In after he had told her that he could not afford to support her any longer. They had a talk on the street, and she says she told him, "You'll never live to see the light of day."

"He tried to slip me," she said to the reporter, "and going into his room I went through his pockets, tore up my picture and took out of his trunk a revolver I bought to shoot him with before." When Deming came home he kept the door locked against her, and when he tried to sneak out she discharged the revolver through the partly opened door. She offered to fetch a physician, but after saying he forgave her, he went out of the house and drove off in a cab. Thinking he had gone to his physician's, she went there and not finding him visited the Grand Central Depot. Not getting any trace of him she gave herself up to a policeman and passed the night in Capt. Williams's station-house. She added that if she thought Deming would come back to her she would not say a word against him. She shot him because he was tired of her and was trying to be rid of her. "I don't know whether I'm sorry or not that I didn't kill him," she soliloquized, "but he better not come near me again or I will kill him, that's all." There is nothing attractive or fascinating about the woman now, although it is said that three years ago she was plump and pretty. Apparently all the characteristics of an adventuress. It is easy to see how Tagliaferro became ensnared by her. He is sample clerk in a liquor house in lower Broadway and at the time of his marriage earned $15 a week. His frankness makes it painfully apparent that he was easily gulled. To a reporter he said:

I was introduced to the woman and supposed her modest and respectable. She introduced Deming as her guardian and accounted for his frequent visits by saying that she had been left property which required a good deal of attention. He made no objection to our marriage and we were married one evening and went to the theatre afterwards. She told me her husband, whose name was Bowie, was dead. Her home was in Honduras, but she had been living in Philadelphia. After we had been married about three weeks she said she was ill and wished to visit her aunt in New Brunswick. The next Saturday she called at my place of business and gave her half my salary. She gave me an address to write her, but it was wrong. The next week she came for money again and I gave it to her by advice of my lawyer, although I then knew of her relations with Deming. Once she complained to the head of the house where I was employed that I refused to support that they had to put her out of the office. I never owed anybody a penny, and the story of the note is a lie. I can't believe what she says. Such a time as I have had out of the country and got a divorce herself, but I have been able to defeat her plans and am free from her."

Charles E. Le Barbier, of No. 35 Broadway, who was counsel for Tagliaferro, said:

All that my client has said is supported by the evidence on the reference in the divorce before Jerome Buck. Judge Potter granted Mr. Tagliaferro an absolute divorce July 14. The suit was commenced in March, 1886, and in April a motion for alimony was denied. This was based on an affidavit of the landlady where Mrs. Harvey lived, showing her improper relations with Deming. I have always thought there was a conspiracy between them to get for a fool. I commenced suit against Deming on behalf of my client for $20,000 damages for alienating his wife's affections. There was never any diminution of the amount asked, but the case was finally dropped because we did not want to complicate matters. Deming alleges that it was blackmail, but you can judge from the facts whether the poor fellow had any grounds or not to base it on. When the summons and complaint were ready to be served some one from my office waited at Tagliaferro's place of business for the woman to come there and strike him for money. This man got on the same car with her going up Broadway. It was a stormy March day and the car was crowded. When she started to get out at the Post Office the man with the papers handed her off and escorted her to the sidewalk. She thought him wonderfully polite. As he anticipated Deming was waiting close by and as the Colonel came up the summons-server was up. Then he presented the papers to her and Deming turned all colors, for he seemed to mistrust what was up. He was also served with papers as co-respondent and defendant in the suit for damages.

On the two or three other occasions when the woman called at Tagliaferro's for money Deming waited for her on Broadway. Once she signalled for him to get on a car by wiping the window with her handkerchief, and some one whom she did not know heard her say to Deming: "I only got $7 out of that sucker," referring to her husband. She must be a terrible creature.
